The Obama campaign has all but officially conceded the fact that Republicans have found a new money spigot to use in their effort to elect Mitt Romney to the White House in November. But if they were smart, they'd at least try to figure out a way to wring a little more money out of that new source, to show they're not just letting it flow and assume that will be enough to close the deal. After spending the past few days criticizing Romney's Bain Capital years, a white paper released by the Obama campaign's "super PAC" for the first time acknowledged in its executive summary that the firm did do a bit of investing in the midst of the financial meltdown. In fact, Bain had a net worth of $15.3 billion at the time of its 2002 sale to private equity firm Bain Capital. That's a lot of money to have been sitting around on the side. And it's the kind of money that could be put to work for the national interest, if not for President Obama, who was head of the U.S. Senate's financial services committee and the Democratic Party platform committee, while Bain was investing in public companies and taking big financial bets. That's where the Obama campaign's ad comes in. It opens with this ominous line: "When Mitt Romney was running Bain Capital, he didn't have time for the middle class." It then shows a series of old clips of Romney denying his firm's impact on the thousands of jobs it took from companies as they were being sold off or went bankrupt.
