October 31, 2016 10:47 pm Governor Jerry Brown has called a special session of the California Legislature to reconvene in Sacramento, from Nov. 16 to Dec. 3, for the passage of the 2016-2017 state budget. The regular session ended on Oct. 15. Fourteen "budget amendment bills" will be considered in the special session, including the "pay-as-you-go" budget; a revision of the measure with no such bill is also expected to be introduced and considered. The governor's secretary of finance will serve as chair of the joint legislative budget committee, composed of the Senate and Assembly Republican and Democratic leaders.
The chair is chosen by the leaders of the two houses. The state constitution requires that the governor submit the general appropriation bill to the Legislature during the regular session, every two years. If the governor fails to do so and a bill is not submitted, the constitution requires the Legislature to submit the first appropriation act of the session to the governor. In that situation, both houses are required to submit the act no later than Jan. 9. The special session is subject to approval by the president of the Senate and the speaker of the Assembly, each of whom has the power to call it. Legislative approval is usually required for any new tax, fee or other measure, to take effect or be renewed, after the Legislature has adjourned. However, the governor can extend that period, if he so chooses.

The legislative period is set by the constitution for the session that begins after the next regular session, but it must end before the next regular session. The constitutional provision limiting a special session to 30 days is not applicable if the session is called by the governor himself. In the special session, new legislation can be passed and voted on by the two houses, unless it is vetoed by the governor. A governor can refuse to sign bills passed by the Legislature when the Legislature
