, an excellent Half-Life game that came out in 2018, for VR. Additionally, the technology is still relatively new and even still has a long way to go before it becomes a standard part of the gaming world so if Half-Life: Alyx had't released at the time of this posting, this article would be titled "Half-Life: Alyx, an excellent Half-Life game that came out in 2019". Overview Half-Life: Alyx is a VR game that sees the player take control of the Master Chief within the confines of motion-controlled "room" in which the player has to travel through. A room is a cube-like area that the player is free to explore by walking around, jumping, climbing, wall running and other movement options. The player's fists and mouth are used to interact with the game (interacting with the environment) and items in the room (interacting with other players in the room) and the player uses teleportation to transition between areas in the room. Players control the camera themselves once inside the room so they can see what is going on around them. The game offers 4 different experiences. Each of these have their own unique "kills" to get, they allow the player to utilize a variety of weapons and powers. Some of the levels have objectives for the player to complete on their way to the next level and these provide varied goals such as completing the level by dealing a certain amount of damage to all the enemies or by killing a certain number of enemies. Whilst others, allow the player to get to new areas in the level by interacting with certain areas. Alyx means Eagle in ancient Hahmish. The player travels through the VR world by suiting up in an armor known as the Alyx Vance Suit (or "Alyx suit") and become the android known as Connor. Together, the player and the suit are a unit. As such, this necessitates a control scheme to allow the player to effectively do simple movements as well as more complex ones. Within the room, the player can move in any direction in any axis they can move the head, hips and shoulders. Once out of the "room", the player navigates through the environment by turning their head in any direction they want. Additionally, the player has the option to get up close and personal with other participants inside the room in the form of a net gun known as
